To study the role of intrathoracic fat space (ITS) in esophageal motor activity and function, static pressure profile studies were performed in 20 healthy volunteers. The pressure transmission from esophageal body to chest wall was measured during simulated upper gastrointestinal swallow. The study protocol included intragastric distension and intragastric injection of air, saline, and water.

The results showed that the pressure transmission was always higher during intragastric distension than during intragastric injection. The ratio of esophageal length to esophageal thickness was higher when intragastric distension was performed than when saline was injected. The 82157476af
